First. The structure of every expression should be carefully studied and fully understood before attempting to write it. Second. The use of the parenthesis is of special importance, as it serves to identify quantities which should be construed together as one, and to distinguish the whole from the parts of an expression. Third. The numerator of a fraction, unless it be a monomial, should be included in a single parenthesis followed by the sign for division, and then the denominator followed by the sign for division ended. The denominator may or may not be inclosed in parentheses, as the case may require. Fourth. When the numerator or denominator is a fraction, it should be written...
