Not illustrated. 1879 Excerpt: . . . in which they are involved, in the hands of later geographers. There has indeed been great discrepancy of opinion among modern writers with regard to the distance actually traversed, and the farthest point to which the navigators attained. Gossellin refused to believe that they advanced farther than Cape Noun (in 28° 40' N. lat.); but this view, though adopted by Walckenaer, 3 may be safely rejected as utterly untenable. It does not indeed satisfactorily explain or agree with any of the principal facts recorded, and is in fact based solely on the assumption that the ancients could not make voyages of any considerable length. Major Kennell on the contrary, in a very valuable and elaborate examination of the question, 5 came to the conclusion that the Southern Horn--the farthest point actually attained by the expedition--was identical with Sherboro Sound, just beyond Sierra Leone (in N. lat. 7° 45'), and startling as it may at first appear that the voyagers should have penetrated so far to the south, the arguments in favour of this view may be regarded as almost, if not quite, conclusive. It has been adopted both by the most recent editor of the Periplus of Hanno (C. Huller), and by M. de St. Martin in his elaborate and valuable work on the ancient geography of Africa. Both of these writers have supplied important corrections and additions, arising in part from our improved acquaintance with the west coast of Africa, since the time of...
